

SEPTEMBER 2015

Iowa Genealogical Society

September 2015

Fall is always a busy time at IGS. Our Fall Conference registration is well underway. John Philip Colletta is our keynote speaker on October 9th and 10th at Toad Valley Country Club in Pleasant Hill. Due to limited seating, please get your registration in as soon as possible. On Friday evening, Oct. 9, we hope that you will join us for the 50th Anniversary Banquet. Reservation requests are on the registration form for the Fall Conference. (pg. 8)

Between our regular class offerings and the Fall Conference, we have two additional opportunities. We will be hosting a presentation on Orphan Trains with Colleen Bradford-Krantz on Sunday, November 1 @ 1:30 p.m. Colleen Bradford-Krantz is an independent journalist, author and documentary filmmaker. Most recently, she directed, co-produced and co-wrote the award-winning documentary, West by Orphan Train, which was released late in 2014 and first broadcast on Iowa Public Television. This program is free and open to the public.

The second opportunity is Swedish Day on Nov. 14, 2015. Our speaker is Kathy Meade. Kathy has been assisting people with Swedish research for more than ten years. She is the North American representative for ArkivDigital. She has given many presentations on Swedish genealogy throughout the country as well as written genealogy articles for the Nordstjernen newspaper. Kathy serves on the advisory board for the Nordic Family Genealogy Center at the Swedish American Museum in Chicago and volunteers at the Arlington Heights Memorial Library helping patrons with their Swedish research.

We hope that you can join us for all of these great programs. They are great opportunities to gain knowledge and network with fellow genealogists.—Jennifer Ewing

George O. Smith -- My Tree's Ancestral Teacher

by George Glenn

First Place Winner in the "Teacher in My Tree" Story Contest

My tree is full of teachers, including my mother, my sister, my wife, my son, a niece, a few cousins and myself, but the one who started the tradition is my maternal grandfather, George Owen Smith (1875-1951). The son of a German immigrant and Civil War Veteran and a woman who'd been born in the gold fields of California, George grew up in the Village of Depue, Selby Township, Bureau County, Illinois (population at the time of about 400), where until the age of 15 or so he attended the 2-room school.) He also worked in the winter with the ice harvest on Lake Depue and in the local coal mines as well as various odd jobs as they came along. In his later teens he attended school sporadically whenever he was out of a job.

George, as the oldest of 7 children, felt it was his obligation to augment the family's finances whenever he could, but the available work tended to be seasonal and sporadic.

It was during what turned out to be his last bit of local schooling in the spring of 1895 that his teacher suggested to him that he might consider teaching himself. George protested that he didn't really want to be a teacher and that he didn't have the education. The teacher argued that taking the county's teacher certification would be a learning experience in itself, so he traveled the 10 miles to Princeton, the county seat, where the superintendent encouraged him to try the exam. He later reported that "as I was leaving . . . he said, 'George, one of the first requirements of a teacher is his ability to use good English. It might be all right for you to say "this here" and "that there," "them things" and "he don't" in the coal mine, but it won't do in the school room.' This was, indeed, my first practical lesson in grammar." He had never before associated the grammar lessons in the Sixth Reader with any practical application. It was also his first clue that a good teacher taught children and not subjects.

He failed the exam. He realized that he needed more education if he were to gain a teacher's certificate, so, borrowing the $50.00 tuition, he attended the 1895 and 1896 10-week summer sessions at the Northern Illinois Normal School in Dixon. At the end of the first session he again took the exam, but again failed, having passed in all subjects but grammar. So it was back to the mines for another year.

At the end of the 1896 session he again took the exam -- and this time he passed. However, having a teacher's certificate doesn't guarantee a job, and all the county's teaching positions were filled. It was back to mine for another year. Now he realized that his experiences could influence his teaching methodology: "While driving a stubborn and deaf mule in a mine (hauling ore cars to be unloaded) could hardly be classed as educative, particularly as a preparation for teaching boys and girls, it was not without its value. . . . There's a great deal of psychology in 'muleology.'"

His first teaching job was in a small school in Hollowayville, after which he taught for two years in similar schools in Ottville and at his "home" school in Depue. In the meantime (1898) he worked as a laborer on the gang building the Illinois-Mississippi Canal.

Deciding to attend Valparaiso University he worked the 1900 US census for Shelby Township to earn tuition money and spent the next year in Indiana, obtaining his BA in 1901.

More teaching positions followed in Putnam, Malden (where he met and married my grandmother) and Ladd. In 1910 he was persuaded to run for county in 1943.

As a teacher and administrator he was always progressive in his ideals and methodology. From an ignorant village kid he overcame an inadequate early education to become an erudite teacher, innovative administrator, and scholar, turning to the study of local history in his retirement. He published a monograph on the Owen Lovejoy Home/Underground Railroad in Princeton, a history of Princeton, a history of Bureau County, and a number of self-published volumes of poetry, as well as his autobiography, as yet unpublished.

The Geographic Files: A Hidden Resource Gem

by Tasha Jackson, IGS 2nd Vice President

While visiting our library, have you ever stopped to look through the Geographic Files? The bottom two drawers of the filing cabinet adjacent to the computer area house a treasure trove of resources just waiting to help you with your research! The Geographic Files are pages, pamphlets, and booklets of resources from locations all over the world, not just Iowa. Some of the unique Iowa-specific resources include information about different breweries in the state, the history of Camp Dodge, details about the state's mental hospitals, maps of Des Moines cemeteries, and a booklet listing the pardons and suspensions of sentence that were granted by the Governor between 1900 and 1902.

For other areas of the country, we have lists of wagon trains that traveled to California, railroad maps, and details about early U.S. forts. We have an article from an 1873 edition of Harper's Weekly about New York's Castle Garden immigration center, and records from Old Plymouth Cemetery in Massachusetts. We have descriptions of major 19th century epidemics in North America, to help put causes of death during that time period into context, and maps of the country as it existed in 1718.

For those researching their European ancestors, the Geographic Files contain a guide to Norwegian Farm and Family History books currently housed in the special collections at the University of North Dakota's library. We have guides for African-American, Welsh, and Italian research, and information from the Czech embassy to assist researchers in ordering copies of vital certificates for their family members that were born in Bohemia and Moravia. There are lists of Danish immigrants that landed in Baltimore between 1890 and 1899, and even someone's personal genealogy written entirely in German.

Next time you visit the library, consider checking out these files. You may find something there that can help you get over that brick wall in your research!

Congratulations to our winners in the "A Teacher in Your Tree!" Story Contest!

Genealogical Proof Standard Step 4: Resolving Conflicts: Therapy for Problematic Evidence

By Alice Hoyt Veen, CG

You've crafted a focused research question, conducted a thorough search of relevant sources, pulled out the evidence that might answer your question, and correlated your findings. Now what? If the evidence is clear, uncontested & reliable, hooray! You can skip Step 4 and go right to Step 5: writing your conclusions. But if the data includes major inconsistencies or disagreements that impact your ability to arrive at a confident solution, it's time to put your evidence on the analyst's couch and provide some therapeutic intervention for those troubled sources.

What types of conflicts require resolution?

Serious problems affecting kinship, family structure, generational connections, or major life events require remedial action. Good news: the GPS techniques you've already learned provide the tools to successfully address these issues. So begin with a thorough review of the research you've completed. Have you missed or misunderstood anything that would impact the findings? Have you consulted as many original, independent sources as possible? Do you truly understand the historical or legal context of each source? Double check for quality—unreliable informants or secondary information may be leading you astray. If your research and analysis are solid but issues remain unresolved, you'll need to expand your search to new records, and get "outside the box" in pursuit of new evidence from a diverse range of sources.

Investigate collateral family lines, including those generations preceding and succeeding your ancestor. Go after your ancestor's "FAN Club" (Friends, Associates, Neighbors). Delve into neighbors and neighborhoods—look for patterns of association. Who witnessed major documents for your ancestor? When does he appear as a witness? You may need to conduct some page-by-page surveys of records such as census, land transactions, vital records, or court records. Identify and access the variety of sources generated at different phases of your ancestor's life—childhood, adolescence, adulthood, and end of life.

Collection of more data requires additional "analysis & correlation"—so stay organized. Tables, charts & timelines are great correlation tools, but as your source list grows, you may need more robust methods such as databases, spreadsheets or mind maps to organize and visualize large bodies of evidence. Be sure to keep your research log up-to-date with full citations of all sources consulted.

At the end of the day, resolution of your problem may require a process of elimination, one possibility at a time. Or you may need to (temporarily) concede defeat. If your best efforts remain unrewarded, consider setting the work aside for a time; coming back to a problem after you've had a break is sometimes the best strategy. Whatever the outcome, well-organized source-cited research will provide long-lasting benefits to your overall genealogical project and provide a solid foundation for future discoveries.
